The philosophy of Restorative Practice views relationships and people as the most important aspect of schools and communities. Schools embracing this philosophy prioritise building positive relationships, creating supportive learning environments and establishing fair, democratic systems across their community. A restorative approach seeks to address the harm caused to people and relationships in the wake of mistake making, and repair that harm with those most affected. Schools undertaking this approach work towards and experience culture change.

During this online series of workshops, participants will have the opportunity to explore the philosophy of restorative practice and how it is applied in classrooms and school communities.

This training will cover:

- Using circles to build classroom communities
- The philosophy of Restorative Practice and its application in schools
- A psychological theory of emotion explaining why restorative approaches work
- Using restorative chats to repair harm in a range of situations (1 on 1, small/large group)

Suitable for: This introductory training is suitable for all educators, in both primary and secondary settings, looking to develop the skills required to successfully build and maintain classroom community.
